The Education Law Center

For more than 25 years, the Education Law Center (ELC) has helped families and students solve problems with their public schools, helped families and students understand and enforce their legal rights, and pressed for reforms in the public education system that advance quality and equity. ELC's programs benefit children who have been poorly served by the public education system, poor children and those who live in school districts that don't have adequate resources, children with disabilities who need special services to learn to their potential, and English language learners who need help to learn English and to advance academically.

The Pennsylvania School Reform Network, established in 1993 as a project of the Education Law Center-PA, advocates for public education reforms that have a track record of success in raising student achievement. PSRN works on making the system responsive to children who are disadvantaged by poverty, disability, or by speaking a native language other than English. Its methods focus primarily on grassroots organizing and citizen education, but PSRN is also respected for our policy analysis and advocacy in the media around state policy debates.

In 2001, ELC accomplished the following:

Increased families' ability to advocate for their children's rights

- We continued to provide advice, information and technical assistance to more than 4,471 parents, advocates and advocacy groups throughout Pennsylvania, the majority of whom were from the Philadelphia region.
- We substantially revised all of our "fact sheets" and manuals to reflect recent changes in state law. This included three major parents' guides on special education and attorneys' fees, and literally dozens of "fact sheets." We are now proceeding with translating the key publications into Spanish.
- We distributed directly (as opposed to through expanded access through our website) more than 13,000 copies of our manuals and other publications.
- We expanded our two webpages, and added lots of new features, like a schedule of statewide parent training opportunities. Virtually all of our publications can be downloaded directly from our websites.
- We held more than 43 training sessions on children's rights to appropriate special education services, which were attended by approximately 2,452 families and professionals. We have supplemented our training efforts by updating and expanding our "Clearinghouse" of materials for parents and advocates, and we have increased the capacity of our Buddy System – volunteer parents and professionals – to work "hands on" with families in their area.

Increased children's access to services.

- SY 2000-2001 was the first School Year since this lawsuit was settled in the early 1990's that there was significant progress in improving services for class members -- Chester Upland School District students with significant behavior problems. New behavior support programs were begun or expanded, transition programs were created, quality administrative and instructional staff were hired, and the PA Department of Education assigned monitoring staff (and backed those staff when needed to insure that the District did not continue its historic pattern of sabotaging compliance efforts) This School Year, the district has been almost completely privatized, that is, 9 out of its 10 schools are being operated by Edison, Inc , a private company By agreement of the parties, the Judge entered an order mandating that we receive information that will allow us to monitor the status of our class members and the required programs The Judge also ordered that an expert conduct impartial reviews at mid-year and after the school year has ended If the district is successful this school year also, we will end the lawsuit (Duane B v. Chester Upland School District)
- This lawsuit, which resulted in a radical reform of Philadelphia Infants and Toddlers Program, ended in February The County program, which has a population at any one time of approximately 1300 children under age 3, now has a computerized tracking system and has dramatically reduced the number and length of service delays Approximately 1000 families were offered "makeup" services because of past delays Although the lawsuit is officially "over," the state and Philadelphia County have agreed to continue the essential components of the settlement agreement's data collection and monitoring requirements, and have agreed to keep ELC informed about and engaged in the process if problems occur (Sebastian I. v. Philadelphia)
- ELC worked on solidifying the remedy in our lawsuit on behalf of hard-to-serve children with disabilities. A state-level case manager is now assigned to every child who is a member of the Cordero class (i.e. , every child who needs services that his or her school district can't currently provide, and who has waited (or is likely to wait) 30 days or more for those services). Interagency approaches have become the norm, rather than the exception, in addressing these children's needs, and supplemental funding to cover extraordinary costs is available None of these resources existed in 1991 when we filed Cordero Less satisfying has been the state's progress in actually developing new service options for students, there is still, in our view, too heavy a reliance on approved private school and institutional placements, some of them out of state. About 2000 students, statewide, have been served under the Cordero litigation (Cordero v. Commonwealth)
- We worked out a -- hopefully -- final Stipulation in our case concerning language-minority children in the Philadelphia School District. Under the agreement, the District will conduct annual internal evaluations, and external evaluations at least every three years, of the quality of its programs for English language learners, students with disabilities are specifically addressed in the "program standards" set out in the Stipulation In order to help implement the Stipulation, the district has recently convened a new working group to address the needs of language-minority children with disabilities Also, although our litigation was on behalf of students from Asian backgrounds only (as a result of some specific programmatic decisions that the District had made with regard to those children), the District is implementing its programs for all children whose native language is other than English. (Y.S v School District of Philadelphia)

- Through litigation, we compelled the School District of Philadelphia to hire and train staff to provide individualized help for students with significant behavior problems when the students cannot get those services through Medical Assistance. In addition, the District agreed not to exclude from school those children who do not have individualized help. The PA Department of Education issued a directive to all school districts in the state telling them that they can't rely entirely on the MA system to provide this help -- and that they have an independent duty to provide this service to children who need it to learn. This year we monitored this agreement through a stakeholders' Task Force (which included ELC and PP&A), which meets regularly (Kellner, et al v School District of Philadelphia, et al)
- This was the year in which the Philadelphia School District achieved compliance in our T.B v. School District litigation. T.B. applies to children who have not yet been identified as having disabilities, but who have committed a serious behavioral offense (or series of offenses) and have been recommended for expulsion or transfer to a "disciplinary school." The T.B. order requires the district to determine, in these cases, whether the child's history shows signs of a possible disability -- and, if so, to evaluate the child and (if a disability is found) offer a special education program. Under T.B., a significant number of children with disabilities who would otherwise have simply been expelled or transferred, without ever receiving an evaluation, have been identified and served. At the beginning of the year, the district was complying with T.B. about 50% of the time, however, we pressed for intervention by the state Department of Education (also a defendant in the case), and by the end of the school year, compliance had risen to nearly 100%.

Promoted policies that advance opportunities for children and young adults.

- ELC worked with families and other advocates -- with some success -- to retain important protections for children with disabilities in state regulations. With respect to the regulations that govern special education for children ages 3-21, we were able to retain limitations on the age ranges of students in special programs; the deadline for providing services to children; and broad eligibility criteria for pre-schoolers. Approximately 300,000 children will be affected by these regulations each year.
- ELC persuaded the state to use our proposed regulatory language to prevent public charter schools from discriminating against children with disabilities in admissions policies, and to require the schools to report annually on their students with disabilities.
- ELC joined with other advocates and families in persuading the state to change its proposed regulations for infants and toddlers with disabilities. Some of our victories include adopting a 14 day deadline for implementing the early intervention plans, dumping the "screening" process that we argued denied children comprehensive evaluations, and making clear that foster parents can serve as "surrogate parents" for children who do not have birth families. The state also worked closely with us and the coalition of advocates that we staff to upgrade the regulatory credentials for key early intervention staff. Roughly 16,000 children under 3 received services in the infants and toddlers system last year.

Pressed for School Funding Reform

- PA state legislators relied upon PSRN's analysis of the school funding situation to create the charge to the House Select Committee on Public Education Funding
- PSRN helped in drafting his ground-breaking "Successful Schools Budget" proposal, which has received nearly universal support from the state's newspapers
- As part of an aggressive media strategy, PSRN visited nearly every major newspaper's editorial board to solicit support – successfully – for making school funding reform the top priority in the coming election year
